Law Enforcement Partnerships with Probation and Parole

Information sharing between community supervision agencies and police departments can benefit both groups. When law enforcement officials early on supervising officials after conducting anonymous visits on probationers or parolees, during a traffic stop or at an arrest, the information may help the local police’s case file. Information about an offender’s associates or an offender’s visits to places that are off-limits can also help probation and parole officers monitor offenders. Such information may include the following:

- The identity of family members
- The identity of coworkers and other probationers and parolees in the neighborhood of the offender under supervision
- The neighborhood where drug sales are typically made
- The location of schools or day care centers near the offender’s residence or workplace (important to supervisors working with sex offenders)

Information sharing can be beneficial to the police force, especially in the event that the officer comes in contact with an offender who has the potential to be violent or an offender who needs additional support and guidance about mental illness issues.

Many communities have realized that cooperation between probation and parole officers and police officers can help prevent and reduce community violence and crime. The program pairs probation and parole officers with police officers to prevent recidivism and curtail youth violence. The partnerships are crucial in reducing supervision costs and improving the effectiveness of the criminal justice system.

Probation and parole officers monitor offenders. Such information can be searched by other law enforcement agencies. A comprehensive incident-based reporting system (SIRS) that accompanies state identification cards and driver’s licenses provides a rapid means to accurately determine identification. AFIS decreased the time it takes to accurately determine identification. AFIS decreased the time it takes to accurately determine identification. AFIS decreased the time it takes to accurately determine identification. AFIS decreased the time it takes to accurately determine identification. AFIS decreased the time it takes to accurately determine identification. AFIS decreased the time it takes to accurately determine identification. AFIS decreased the time it takes to accurately determine identification.

A Force for Positive Change

Community corrections are at the core of the justice system and maintain safety in our communities. Probation and parole officers interview to prevent the recurrence of crimes among juveniles and adult defendants and offenders by supervising them and getting people back on the right track. Probation and parole officers are crucial in working with sex offenders (working with sex offenders)

Probation and parole officers monitor offenders. Such information can be searched by other law enforcement agencies. A comprehensive incident-based reporting system (SIRS) that accompanies state identification cards and driver’s licenses provides a rapid means to accurately determine identification. AFIS decreased the time it takes to accurately determine identification. AFIS decreased the time it takes to accurately determine identification. AFIS decreased the time it takes to accurately determine identification. AFIS decreased the time it takes to accurately determine identification. AFIS decreased the time it takes to accurately determine identification. AFIS decreased the time it takes to accurately determine identification. AFIS decreased the time it takes to accurately determine identification. AFIS decreased the time it takes to accurately determine identification. AFIS decreased the time it takes to accurately determine identification.

Provision for Positive Change

Community corrections are at the core of the justice system and maintain safety in our communities. Probation and parole officers interview to prevent the recurrence of crimes among juveniles and adult defendants and offenders by supervising them and getting people back on the right track. Probation and parole officers are crucial in working with sex offenders (working with sex offenders)
Who Are Probation and Parole Officers?

D iffering from police officers who generally appear in marked vehicles and may have discretion to order an arrest, depending on the jurisdiction. In certain communities, a parole or probation officer who supervises a specific type of offender or case can become an expert in helping offenders with specialized issues and needs. Some examples of specialized caseloads include the following:

- Sex offenders
- Offenders with mental illnesses
- Domestic violence offenders

Offenders with specialized caseloads may also work closely with community groups that can help offenders find work, a place to live, and the other services they need, goals that may be challenging to accomplish when the parties themselves meet cooperatively to decide how to do it. This can lead to transformation of people, relationships, and communities.8 Typically, restorative justice is composed of the following components: victim-offender mediation; victim-offender restitution. In some jurisdictions, a parole or probation officer who supervises a specific type of offender or case can become an expert in helping offenders with specialized issues and needs. Some examples of specialized caseloads include the following:

- Sex offenders
- Offenders with mental illnesses
- Domestic violence offenders

Specialization

While most adult parole and probation officers spend most of their time managing home and workplace contacts with offenders, others may have specific duties such as pre-sentence investigation reports, drug testing, alcohol monitoring with ignition interlock devices, computer monitoring software, and other electronic monitoring systems. Knowledge of how these devices operate demonstrates the expertise exhibited by many parole and probation officers.